FROM FREEMAN'S JOURNAL EDITORIAL THE MAYORALTY CONTEST.

The "ring," as the corrupt coslition for controlling the plunder of the public in this city, is called, hepe that they have made Boole's election sure. Supervisor Butt runs for the purpose of being defeated. The word is given through the server Leagues, that the Abolition vote is to be alven to Boole. Boole was opdy-kee nominee for City Impector. He ought to be acceptable to Opdy-ke's party for Mayor.

The contest is to be an explicit one between an honest and unwerving Democrat, and an unholy coallition of Abolitionists. Black Republicans, municipal plunderers and corrupted Democrats. The Himain, Trist, Tariers and Women, either openly or secretily are working for Boole. Every paper that can be subsidized is secuped for Boole. A rich time of rob bling the city we will have to pay for the extravagant waste of mosely to elect Boole.

Hill, if the Democrats will, without less of time, complete an organization—detailing a sufficient number of trusty and competent men to watching every polling booth—to seeing that tickets are supplied, and that there is no cheating, we believe Gunther will telested. If elected, it will be a most glorious victory of Democratic principle over fraud and curruption.

READ, AND THEN TRY BRIENT'S COLUMBIAN BALM, or, MAGICAL BAIR REBTORATIVE—For the short time that the allow excellent preparation has been before the public, its popularity and fast increase in sales has far exceeded our most sanguine expectations, although we felt satisfied that when it once became known and used, it would be easyrly sought after by all whose hair had become thin, or who were entirely baid. The great success and popularity of our Hair Dive, was also a guarantee that our Restordire had only to become known to be appreciated. This Balm is of the test stimulants for the grewth of the Hair or Whiskers ever brought before the public—of this we are fully satisfied, not only from our own experience, but from many whose hair had fallen out, leaving spots as lerge as a dollar completely hare, and wince an now boast of a fine and healthy head of hair. "I; say. Morvan," resumed he cautiously, "can the Reseauvel and Lauvoc beats have been so often here, and not left some Christian under water?"

"What then?" repeated the sailor, who seemed divided between faar and shame. "Why — you know what they say—I did not invent it. They say that drowned men who die in their sins leave their spirits in the waters which swallowed them; and every year, at the day and hour of the mishap, they cry out in agony for our prayers."

"And you believe that do you, Lacer?" said Morvan, with a laugh which had more noise than confidence in it.

he was already beyond it. Fivel: attempts were not more successful; and twenty times he renewed his search, to come always on the same deep water. Alarmed, and out of breath, he aruck out at ramdom, trying to find ground, without being able even to distinguish the late of Graves from the late of Treberon. After having turne! and re-turned for a long time, struggling against the water, into which he plunged deeper every minute, and passing again and again from despair to hope, until his strength and spirit were quite worn out, he felt that he was beaten at last. His breathing grew painful, and a mist fell upon his eyes—everything becoming a whirling chaos to him, and his senses were falling him. Yet another instant, and Francine and he must sink beneath the billows! The plunsee, which he had tried to avoid, and which he no lodger distinguished, was their last chance for life. He collected his remaining strength to utter a shoun for help; but a still heavier sea stiffed it on his lips. Half dead, and no longer having more feeling than the instinct of self preservations which outlives the will, he struggled yet a moment, thrown from wave to wave, and then fells himself going down! But all at once he stopped: his feet had found the reaf. They made a firm footing on its—he righted himself again; and the water, which was blinding him, seemed now to subside. He took breath looked before him, and Forceived at about a hundred paces off, the scarped rock of the Isle of Graves.

A few minutes sufficed to reach it. As he reached the shore, he sank down, calling Francine in a faint voice. The termine girl could only answer him by throwing herself into his arms, in which he clasped her for a long time. His first hought he does not coloud and the powder-magazine in order to avoid the sentry posted at the corner which overlooked the great readstead; and when he reached the ordunance-keeper's door, he knocked gently, for feer of being heard by those outside. Fortunstally Dorot slept the light sleep of an old soldier; he awoke a the window. "Open the door," said Matthewin a winger.

"Ropars!" cried the sergeant, confounded.
"Not so loud! and come quick." replied the sailecr. 'our life depends upon it." Dorot came quickly down, drew the bolt, and brought them in. Matthew stepped inside the threshold, with the child clincing to his knees.
"Heaven help us! where do you come from, Ropars!" asked the sergeant.
"You see," replies the seaman: "we come from the sea, which we have crossed to get here."
Dorot drew back, with an exclamation of surpilse. "Is it possible?" cried he. "In God's name, whas has happened to make, you risk your life in this way?"
"What has happened," replied Matthew,
"Is, that Jeannette died this morning of the fever,"
"What you saked me. Dorot; and as Genevieve and I would save the other, I have brought her to you."

and I would save the other, I have brought her to you."

"Heaven reward you for the thought!" said the sergeant; "the child is welcome!" He held out his hand to Matthew; but he did not take it.

"Think well of what I ask of you," resumed he; "perhaps the child may bring the sickness and sorrow to you here."

"I hope not," replied Dorot; "but God's will be done!"

"Recollect, too," persisted the quarter-master, "if the thing is heard of, there is a chance of your being punished for having broken the quarentine."

"Then man's will be done!" replied the sergeant with simplicity.
